

Hunger Games: How Hungry Would You Be?

In a post World War 3 world that experienced all the tragedy of a nuclear war, subsequent nuclear winter, and the Dark Days, the once powerful United States now lies in shambles, organized into 13 separate districts now known as Panem. These districts have a specialized good they produce as defined by the capitol. The amount of jobs that currently exist within these specialized economies are slim, even in areas that are known for a certain product already. The question then is just how many people find themselves out of work and struggling to survive in an already harsh, post nuclear war world? Or, did the population get so drastically reduced that Panem was able to organize these economies with some sort of efficiency?

By : Nathan Conn

*The Hunger Games trilogy makes mention of Panem covering the entire North American continent. Without a doubt, some of these districts, most likely 4, 5, 6, 7, and 10 would all expand north or south, however for the purposes of this map I only analyzed economic data from the US and therefore only confined the districts to the US.

